Hello, everyone!

When people in Japan hear the word "festival," about 70 % of them seem to associate it with fireworks. I like the fireworks in the big (あ) night sky. They shine in a variety of colors and draw us into fantasy. On the other hand, we can enjoy fireworks easily by lighting small home fireworks. Actually, I think "Senko Hanabi," a sparkler, is the best firework to enjoy in Japan.

Sparklers were first (い) in Japan. In the Edo period, people played with fireworks which were made by placing gunpowder on one end of a straw. They looked as if they were incense sticks to offer to Buddhist altars. That's why they were named "Senko Hanabi," incense sticks like fireworks.

Sparklers used to be made everywhere in Japan. From the 1970s, however, foreign-made ones were distributed in Japan, and in the 1980s most of them took the place of the ones (う) made because they were cheap. So, the makers in Japan went bankrupt. In 1998, all of the "Senko Hanabi" makers in Japan disappeared from the market in Japan.

Yamagata Tsunehiro, a Toy wholesale merchant in Tokyo decided to make Japan made sparkler in 1998 and completed making the (え) ones. It took two years to complete it.

We can watch four different spark phases of the sparklers, especially with the ones made in Japan. Many Japanese people (お) the four different phases with their own life. Once a sparkler is lit by you, it symbolizes your own life.
